

Booth Display Info and Recommendations

At the GVFM, vendors are given either an inline or a corner booth, with a few exceptions.

An inline booth means that booths are set up back-to-back and/or side to side. The booths are set up in rows along the length of the event space to maximize the number of displays. With an inline booth, expect to be surrounded by other booths and/or a wall on all sides except one. With clear access to one aisle, you can focus your attention on passing patrons and interact or collaborate with the booths beside you.

Below are a few inline booth designs we recommend to make the most of your space!

A corner booth is situated at the end of an aisle. The biggest difference between a corner booth and an inline booth is it provides access to attendees from two sides.
